Reality Needs Joy: Lessons learned from failure and starting over

Last year I wrote about some good advice I got when my last startup failed. For the past year, my life has been more or less “cleaned up,” and I’ve essentially started over.

Today, my team and I are diving deep into this new era of work. It is an exciting time of change in the workplace, with many new challenges and benefits. Work impacts our whole life — from the means to survive, to self worth, and even to our core identity. It should be no wonder work is directly connected to health. That’s why we are building a health app for work.

It’s great to be on the upswing and to have found an exciting purpose to focus on again. Even still, I continue to apply a few lessons I learned the hard way through starting over. I thought I’d share them. Happily, I don’t think you need to fail big and start over to try applying any of these lessons for yourself.

First lesson learned - Start with people.

SOS Community Services

SOS promotes housing stability and family self-sufficiency through collaboration, care and respect. Each year, SOS helps more than 7,000 people in Washtenaw County by providing integrated and comprehensive services for those who experience homelessness or face challenges that could result in homelessness.

SOS helps homeless families find permanent homes through shelter and rapid re-housing. For families living paycheck to paycheck, we offer food, utility assistance, and other resources to overcome financial emergencies without becoming homeless. SOS helps families in public housing avoid eviction, find work, and access education. And for children, SOS offers parenting support, early childhood intervention, and educational summer activities.

SOS was recently awarded a grant through AAACF's Community Grantmaking Program for their services to marginalized parents and families through the Parents as Teachers (PAT) program. PAT promotes kindergarten readiness and healthy child development, reducing child abuse and neglect. By investing in programs and organizations like SOS, our community can address issues exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic.
